

THE WRITER

For Matt to continue this process without any clear resources would be an affront to the overall project. The writer recognizes with certainty that there is limited return for this overall process. There is a place where these endeavors are rewarded, but they seem more about the temporary rewards offered by this experience.

If there was a significant awareness of an alternative manifestation of social cohesiveness, the writer has observed these forces and the process of observation has confirmed the value of these insights. The process of observation can provide a pretext for a more critical outlook about the project. This can include the elaboration of an organizational vision, the implementation of a plan, the intellectual lessons learned from the action plan, a sense of motivation and support for these efforts, a forum for growth and personal creativity, and an ability to describe critical assets that are secured through this experience.

Even in observing Reunion, the writer needs to acknowledge an independent project by the participants. This project is based on very limited resources. At the same time, there is a greater commitment to existing security commitments of the society.
